Son of phase one

As many of the articles to this special issue of Canada Watch dedicated to Canadian Studies incorporate the personal histories of their authors, I am afraid that I will have to come clean with mine. I was in the process of completing my doctorate in a rather innovative media studies program at SUNY/Buffalo when, much to my surprise, I was hired to teach Film Studies at the University of Western Ontario. Yes, I had to find London, Ontario on a map.

When I arrived in 1975 and took my place as a newly minted New Yorker/Canadian, I was in for a bit of a culture shock. My knowledge of Canada was largely limited to my field, though no small thing that. McLuhanism was in its heyday, the National Film Board and the CBC.

Canadian Studies: A victim of its own success?

The challenges facing Canadian Studies programs in Canada

In theory, Canadian Studies should be a thriving academic pursuit across the country. Today, an unprecedented number of scholars focus on Canadian issues. We Canadians have good reasons to be interested in the issues we face as individuals and as a collectivity: because of the series of challenges facing the country as a whole, ongoing concerns about Quebec’s place in the country, the historical inequalities experienced by Aboriginal peoples, women, ethnic and racial minorities, and the differently abled, and current fears about economic and environmental change, Canadian concerns are very much as relevant and important as they are in any other country.

Yet Canadian Studies as an academic enterprise faces difficulties. In many programs, the number of students choosing to major in the “multidiscipline” remains low, even while demand for specific classes.

Son of phase one, page 2

Canadian Studies: A victim of its own success?

by Seth Feldman, page 1

Canadian Studies: A victim of its own success?

by Colin Coates, page 1

What has changed? Three decades in Canadian Studies

by Janice Dickin, page 5

Les études canadiennes à la croisée des chemins?

by Pierre Anctil, page 8

“Your major is Canadian Studies? What’s that?”

by Natalie Riggs, page 10

Canadian Studies at a small, undergraduate, Atlantic university: Looking to the future

by Della Stanley, page 11

The ongoing crisis of Canadian Studies

by Richard Nimijean, page 14

Has Canadian Studies had its day?

by Joan Sangster, page 17

The future of Canadian Studies: A Gen-Xer’s perspective

by Peter Hodgins, page 20

Toward a recovery of social solidarity?

by Ian Angus, page 22

Letters from Denmark: Thoughts on Canadian Studies

by Claire Campbell, page 24

Too much of a good thing? The case for Canadian Studies in the 21st century

by Andrew Nurse, page 26

Les études québécoises à l’Université du Québec à Trois-Rivières: un programme d’études avancées et un centre de recherche

by Stéphane Castonguay, page 31

The Journal of Canadian Studies then and now

by Donald Wright, page 33

Son of phase one

by Seth Feldman, page 1

Canadian Studies: A victim of its own success?

by Colin Coates, page 1

What has changed? Three decades in Canadian Studies

by Janice Dickin, page 5

Les études canadiennes à la croisée des chemins?

by Pierre Anctil, page 8

“Your major is Canadian Studies? What’s that?”

by Natalie Riggs, page 10

Canadian Studies at a small, undergraduate, Atlantic university: Looking to the future

by Della Stanley, page 11

The ongoing crisis of Canadian Studies

by Richard Nimijean, page 14

Has Canadian Studies had its day?

by Joan Sangster, page 17

The future of Canadian Studies: A Gen-Xer’s perspective

by Peter Hodgins, page 20

Toward a recovery of social solidarity?

by Ian Angus, page 22

Letters from Denmark: Thoughts on Canadian Studies

by Claire Campbell, page 24

Too much of a good thing? The case for Canadian Studies in the 21st century

by Andrew Nurse, page 26

Les études québécoises à l’Université du Québec à Trois-Rivières: un programme d’études avancées et un centre de recherche

by Stéphane Castonguay, page 31

The Journal of Canadian Studies then and now

by Donald Wright, page 33
Son of phase one  continued from page 1

were flourishing and innovative institutions, and Canada was known internationally in that small circle of experimental film and video of which I was a part. During my five years in Buffalo, we became familiar with the CBC and often visited Toronto to see films, videos, and the many other cultural artifacts not available where we lived. We also suffered from chief executive envy—Nixon vs. Trudeau—and with the Vietnam War still beckoning, a quick dash to the Peace Bridge was always a possibility.

CANADIAN CONTENT?
It was only when I arrived at Western that I discovered a side to Canada that I could not have imagined. My new employers soon made it clear that they were less interested in Canadian film and Canada’s contribution to the new media age than they were in my contribution to the departmental enrolment count with large Hollywood cinema classes. Surely, I thought, the lack of a Canadian Cinema course was an unfortunate oversight. When I proposed designing and teaching such a course, the curriculum committee wanted to see a list of critical literature that would support such a field. There was very little. So Joyce Nelson at Queen’s and I, with the energetic support of Peter Medjuk at the University of Toronto, compiled an anthology and found a small publishing house willing to print it.

“And where will you get the films to show?” the curriculum committee asked; another good question. In addition to the National Film Board’s rich and universally admired collection of documentary and animation, there were a small number of titles available from the experimental film co-ops and a thin blue catalogue from the Canadian Film Institute that contained most of Canada’s surviving cinema heritage (our national film archive having burned to the ground in 1967). Few distributors of Canadian features bothered releasing prints for classroom use. In 1976, a dozen or so of us (an embarrassing number of whom were newly arrived Americans and Brits) organized the Film Studies Association of Canada, in part to generate a demand that might get some films into distribution.

The last piece of the puzzle was the students. It seemed a safe assumption, in the Canada of Pierre Trudeau and the post-PQ national unity crusade, that students would swarm Canadian Cinema. They didn’t. Enrolments were small and those students who did enrol grew impatient with the quality of the films. They discovered to their horror that the feature films didn’t have the production values or big name talent of Hollywood features. Their comments on the course implied that we were being malicious holding back a parallel universe of film achievement when, in reality, Canada’s feature film industry was, at that time, only about a decade old. Its productions were under-budgeted and the true talents of the day were still honing their skills.

Students did admit that the animations were funny—for five or ten minutes. But who cared about documentary? They had seen enough of that in high school. And experimental film, despite our best efforts, was a taste that most students lacked the patience to acquire.

CANADA IN THE SHADOW OF THE UNITED STATES
For a recently arrived immigrant from the self-proclaimed centre of the universe, this willingness to dismiss one’s own culture was culture shock indeed.

Many a Canadian film and filmmaker has been grossly overvalued in an effort to build a national self-esteem.

In the years that followed, I have participated in the argument for Canada’s importance, hoping all the while for a methodology that avoided the American hubris, allowing Canada to judge itself by its own standards. I’m not sure how successful that has been. Much of what I have experienced as Canadian Studies has been grounded in American-style identity politics as it was practised in the 1960s and 1970s. Many a Canadian film and filmmaker has been grossly overvalued in an effort to build a national identity...
A victim of its own success? continued from page 1

remains high. Few institutions outside of Carleton University, the University of Calgary, Trent University, and Mount Allison University are willing to make designated appointments to Canadian Studies programs; most rely on more cost-effective individual faculty enthusiasms and cross-listings to cobble together a suite of courses. The majority of Canadian universities do not provide a program labelled “Canadian Studies.” Moreover, the first generation of Canadian Studies supporters has reached retirement age, leaving a new cohort to establish and enhance the programs, if they are indeed able to survive. We have arrived at an historical moment when reflection on the future of Canadian Studies is not just of passing interest, but is mandatory.

This Robarts Centre publication examines important issues related to the current state of Canadian Studies in Canada, with a few glances abroad. In some lights, Canadian Studies is healthy; in others it is in difficulty—hence the differences of opinion expressed in these pages. Some of the contributors call for a return to the origins of the Canadian Studies project, while others celebrate the new directions that the field has taken of late.

CANADIAN STUDIES IN THE UNITED KINGDOM

As many of the writers indicate, there is no doubt that Canadian Studies receives weak institutional support in many parts of the country. In many universities and colleges, it depends on a small number of academic enthusiasts (and of course students!). Moreover, Canadian Studies does not really have a counterpart in francophone Quebec (even if the challenges facing the graduate program in Études québécoises at the Université du Québec à Trois-Rivières will resonate with anglophone Canadian Studies administrators), Canadian Studies remains, at heart, an English-speaking Canadian endeavour. Even if Canadian Studies was never intended to be unremitting flag-waving patriotism, for some colleagues the future lies in a more critical and theoretical approach to Canadian issues, focusing on First Nations and multicultural critiques of the Canadian nation. For other contributors, institutions must provide better support for their Canadian Studies programs. A few writers point out the vital contributions of Canadianist scholars and students based outside the country, international reminders—borne of the necessity of providing a venue for a wide range of scholars—of the importance of interdisciplinary exchange.

I am certain that, ten years from now, Sesquicentennial Canada will celebrate an imagined community that Centennial Canada could barely imagine. Whether that community is a true post-modern nation or a hollowed-out brand will have to be settled by a very different generation.