This special publication of Canada Watch will be devoted to essays responding to the edited Confederation Papers.

In 1865, politicians in the United Canadas debated the prospect and terms of Confederation. The legislature published these debates, and an abridged version provides a readily accessible source of the political discussions. In these debates we can see some of the contemporary justifications and criticisms of the Confederation deal.

As we at York University look towards the 150th anniversary of Confederation, we believe that it is appropriate and useful to re-examine the debates and explore the logic, presuppositions and absences. The Canadas of 1865 were vastly different than the Canada of 2015, but the general constitutional framework adopted in 1867 still defines many of the parameters of political life today.

“From the vantage point of 2015, how can we use contemporary themes to revisit the Confederation debates of 1865?”
